The person to whom the following letter was addressed, does not wish to betray confidence, and so will not mention names, though he may wish to do so. The letter, and the verses, in French and English, were written by a gentleman of some rank; a native of Ireland; but who appears to have the power of expressing himself with ease and correctness, in the What follows, introductory of the French letter, was, on one occasion, written by the person to whom that French letter was addressed. French tongue. He was prevailed on to promise a copy of the French verses, for the inspection of a French gentleman, a friend of the person to whom this letter was sent; and the sending of the letter was in performance of this promise....
