Excerpt: . alleged informality in their being entered, for which he himself was not obnoxious to blame, it was the general opinion that he would have borne off one of the first prizes. A medal, however, could not be denied him. We have thus far alluded only to Mr. Chickering s professional career. The collateral relations which he sustained were not less creditable and honorable. His musical knowledge, taste, and discrimination were acknowledged by that association which for a quarter of a century has confessedly stood at the head of all musical associations in the Western world. We mean the Handel and Haydn Society, over which he presided for some seven or eight years. While he was at their head the association enjoyed a degree of prosperity and exerted an influence unknown before, and the jarring elements which unfortunately will always mingle where harmony alone...
